

A Long Walk to Water

a breakfast serials story

CHAPTER EIGHT (of 18)

Written by Linda Sue Park
Illustrated by Jim Averbeck

based on a true story

The Stories So Far: Should Nya's family go on the long hard walk to the medical clinic, or should they stay put and hope that her ailing sister will heal on her own? • Salva, his uncle, and the group they are with build canoes in which to cross the Nile.

Southern Sudan, 2008

It was like music, the sound of Akeer's laugh.

Nya and her mother had brought Akeer to the special place—a big white tent full of people who were sick or hurt, with doctors and nurses to help them. After just two doses of medicine, Akeer was nearly her old self again—still thin and weak, but able to laugh as Nya sat on the floor next to her cot and played a clapping game with her.

The nurse, a white woman, was talking to Nya's mother.

"Her sickness came from the water," the nurse explained. "She should drink only good clean water. If the water is dirty, you should boil it for a count of two hundred before she drinks it."

Nya's mother nodded that she understood, but Nya could see the worry in her eyes.

The water from the holes in the lake bed could only be collected in tiny amounts.

If her mother tried to boil such a small amount, the pot would be dry long before they could count to two hundred.

It was a good thing, then, that they would soon be returning to the village. The water that Nya fetched from the pond in the plastic jug could be boiled before they drank it.

But what about next year at camp? And the year after that?

And even at home, whenever Nya made the long hot walk to the pond, she had to drink as soon as she got there.

She would never be able to stop Akeer from doing the same.

Southern Sudan, 1985

The lake's surface was calm, and once the boats had pulled away from the shore, there was not much to see—just water and more water.

They paddled for hours. The scenery and motion were so monotonous that Salva might have slept, except he was afraid that if he did, he might fall over the side. He kept himself awake by counting the strokes of Uncle's paddle and trying to gauge how far the canoe traveled with every twenty strokes.

Before they reached the shore on the other side, the boats pulled up to an island. This was where the fishermen of the Nile lived and worked.

Salva was amazed by what he saw in the fishing community. It was the first place in their weeks of walking that there had been such an abundance of food! The villagers ate a lot of fish, of course, and hippo and crocodile meat as well. But even more impressive were the number of crops they grew: maize, cassava, sugarcane, yams . . .

None of the travelers had money or anything of value to trade, so they had to beg for food. The exception was Uncle: The fishermen gave him food without having to be asked. Salva could not tell if this was because Uncle seemed to be the leader of the group, or because they were afraid of his gun.

Uncle shared his food with Salva—a piece of sugarcane to suck on right away, then fish that they cooked over a fire, and yams roasted in the ashes.

The sugarcane juice soothed the sharpest edge of Salva's hunger. He was able to eat the rest of the meal slowly, making each bite last a long time.

At home Salva had never been hungry. His family owned many cattle; they were among the better-off families in their village of Lou Ariik. Their meals consisted mostly of milk and porridge made from sorghum meal. Every so often, his father went to the marketplace by bicycle. He brought home bags of beans and rice grown elsewhere, because few crops could be raised in the dry semi-desert region of Lou Ariik.

As a special treat, his father sometimes bought mangoes. A bag of mangoes would have been awkward to carry, especially with the bicycle already loaded with other goods. So Salva's father ferried the mangoes home by wedging them into the spokes of his bicycle wheels.

Salva would run to greet him. He could see the green-skinned mangoes spinning gaily in a blur as his father pedaled, and Salva would take a mango from the spokes almost before his father had dismounted.

Salva's mother would peel the mango for him, its juicy insides the same color as her headscarf. She would slice the flesh away from the big flat seed. Salva loved the sweet slices, but his favorite part was the seed. There was always plenty of fruit that clung stubbornly to the seed. He would nibble and suck at it to get every last shred and make it last for hours.

There were no mangoes among the fishermen's great stores, but sucking on his piece of sugarcane reminded Salva of those happier times. He wondered if he would ever again see his father riding a bicycle with mangoes in its spokes.

As the sun touched the horizon, the fishermen abruptly went into their tents. They weren't really tents—just white mosquito netting hung or draped to make a space so they could lie down inside. Not one fisherman stayed to talk or eat more or do anything else. It was almost as if they all vanished together.

Only a few minutes later, mosquitoes rose up from the water, from the reeds, from everywhere. Huge dark clouds of them appeared, their high-pitched whine filling the air.

Thousands, maybe millions, of hungry mosquitoes massed so thickly that in one breath Salva could have ended up with a mouthful if he wasn't careful. And even if he was, they were everywhere—in his eyes, nose, ears, on every part of his body.

The fishermen stayed in their nets the whole night long. They had even dug channels from inside the nets to just beyond them so they could urinate without having to leave their little tents.

It didn't matter how often Salva swatted at the mosquitoes, or that one swat killed dozens at a time: For every one he killed, it seemed that hundreds more swarmed in to take its place. With their high singing whine constantly in his ears, Salva slapped and waved at them in desperate frustration all night long.

No one in the group got any sleep that night. The mosquitoes made sure of that.

In the morning Salva was covered with mosquito bites. The worst one seemed to be in the exact middle of his back, where he couldn't reach to scratch. Those he could reach, though, he scratched until they bled.

The fishermen warned the group to take plenty of water for the next stretch of their journey. Salva still had the gourd that the Jo-Luo woman had given him. Others in the group had gourds too, or plastic bottles. But there were some who did not have a container. They tore strips from their clothing and soaked them in a desperate attempt to carry at least a little water with them.

Ahead lay the most difficult part of their journey: the Akobo desert.

(To be continued.)

Text copyright © 2009 Linda Sue Park
Illustrations copyright © 2009 Jim Averbeck
Reprinted by permission of Breakfast Serials, Inc.
www.breakfastserials.com