

Cartoons for the Classroom

Presented by NIEonline.com and the Association of American Editorial Cartoonists (AAEC)

Between the Lines

Google has stopped censoring search results in China and instead has re-routed traffic to its Chinese language search in Hong Kong, which is unfiltered.

"We want as many people in the world as possible to have access to our services, including users in mainland China, yet the Chinese government has been crystal clear throughout our discussions that self-censorship is a non-negotiable legal requirement."

--Google Blog

<http://googleblog.blogspot.com/>
3/22/2010 12:03:00 PM

David Fitzsimmons / The Arizona Star, Courtesy CagleCartoons.com

Google vs. China

Talking points

1. David Fitzsimmons' cartoon indicates that China's censorship efforts are futile. Explain the flood metaphor the cartoon is using. Who is the government really trying to control?
3. Is Riber Hansson of Sweden taking a stand, or just defining the issue, in his cartoon showing the Great Wall?
3. Why would China want to stop their population from accessing uncensored information? Does your school limit access to services like YouTube or Facebook? Is this "censorship" acceptable to you? What about your parents?

Additional resources

More by David Fitzsimmons

<http://cagle.com/politicalcartoons/PCcartoons/fitzsimmons.asp>

More by Riber Hansson

<http://cagle.com/politicalcartoons/PCcartoons/hansson.asp>

Association of American Editorial Cartoonists

<http://editorialcartoonists.com/>

Riber Hansson, Svenska Dagbladet, Sweden, Courtesy CagleCartoons.com