50+ YEARS OF FAIR HOUSING:
Past, Present and Future in the City of Tampa
Much of what we have surrounded ourselves with in the present environment is unimportant, and it is easy to lose sight of what is important. What can we, as a collective, look back on and be proud of and know that it was right and important?

It has been more than 50 years since the signing of the Fair Housing Act of 1968. Behind this act was a struggle for what is right. The act provided for equal housing opportunities regardless of race, religion, gender or national origin. The passing of this law gave hope for residential desegregation across the United States.

In celebration and recognition of the 50th anniversary of the Fair Housing Act, the In & Out mural in Rowlett Park was created. The east-facing image greets the sunrise and alludes to a welcoming and embracing gesture. This underlying gesture is a collage of elements directly related to how one might experience housing, specifically stairs and doors.

The stairs ascending from the center reach out on either side toward “windows” in the wall that frame the sky. The stairs in the center climb and reach a set of double doors. Behind these images and along the contours are aerial views of housing developments and a repeating pattern of the boundary lines of Sulphur Springs. These areas in the image change color depending on the point of view, hinting at the intent of the Fair Housing Act.

The west-facing image includes similar symbolism, using aerial views of Sulphur Springs and stairs in a symmetrical pattern. The utilization of more subdued colors and a complementary gesture evokes protection and shelter. Throughout the image is the repetition of the key and keyhole symbols.

The central staircases encompassing a keyway are surrounded by two female faces looking in opposite directions, forming the space between the physical elements. The combination of all the central elements forms a symbolized keyhole shape. Together, the symbols are meant to bring to mind a feeling of ease and comfort, while being illuminated by the sunset.

The relationship between the two images personifies basic masculine and feminine roles in a household. Being welcomed, embraced and comforted makes for a higher quality of life. The opportunity to have a home free from discrimination can promote optimism and confidence. This can help to make our communities healthier.

In a place like Sulphur Springs, where diversity is at the forefront of life, freedom from constraint is more important than ever.

PUBLIC ART

Art can be a very effective means of communication. Think about how our culture uses art to communicate ideas. Make a list of all the methods you can think of (cartoons, graphic novels, posters, advertising). Some other cultures have used pictures and symbols as a means of communication: hieroglyphics, pictographs and cave drawings. What impact did this form of communication have on each culture? How do we use pictures and symbols to communicate? Look through the Tampa Bay Times for examples of symbols that represent communication or make a specific statement. Using the articles and images in the Times as a guide, write a news article using only symbols. Share your story with your class.
We have come some of the way, not near all of it. There is much yet to do.

CHAISING THE STATUS QUO

The United States Supreme Court ruled in 1948 in the decision of Shelley vs. Kraemer and in 1968 in the decision of Jones vs. Mayer Co. that housing discrimination was illegal. The rulings “outlawed the exclusion of African Americans or other minorities from certain sections of cities; race-based housing patterns were still in force by the late 1960s,” according to the History Channel editors. Those who challenged these discrimination practices “often met with resistance, hostility and even violence.”

As a large number of black and Hispanic armed forces members were returning back to the United States from serving in the Vietnam War, they had trouble renting and purchasing homes in certain residential areas because of their race or national origin.

“In this climate, organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the G.I. Forum and the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing lobbied for new fair housing legislation to be passed.”

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968

One key portion of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 prohibited discrimination in the sale or rental of housing nationwide. Introduced as House Resolution 2516 by House Judiciary Committee chairman Emanuel Celler of New York on Jan. 17, 1967, the bill passed the House in August 1967 and made it through the Senate with amendments on March 11, 1968.

The House Rules Committee postponed action on the amended Senate bill until April 9. Rules Committee chairman William Colmer of Mississippi was “violently opposed to this kind of legislation.”

On April 4, 1968, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was fatally shot on the balcony of the Lorraine Motel in Memphis, Tenn. King’s murder awakened a week of intense debate in the House over the fate of the legislation as riots spread through cities across the country.

CHAOS AND DEBATE

On Friday, April 5, President Johnson sent a letter to Speaker of the House John McCormack of Massachusetts asking him “to bring this bill to a vote” as soon as possible. After a weekend of violence in the nation’s capital and other cities, the Rules Committee met on April 9. Rather than sending it to the floor for a vote, Colmer hoped to delay the bill by sending it to a conference committee for additional changes.

Rep. John B. Anderson of Illinois had initially been against moving the bill to the floor. When he changed his mind, he became the decisive vote as the Rules Committee rejected Colmer’s plan.

Next, the committee focused its attention to House Resolution 1100, the special rule for the housing bill proposed by Rep. Ray Madden of Illinois. If passed by the House, the resolution would end debate on the Senate’s amended version of H.R. 2516 and send the bill directly to the White House without changes.

On April 10, the House engaged in one hour of heated debate. Opponents decried the intervention of the federal government in what they viewed as a state-level concern. Rep. Joseph D. Waggonner of Louisiana claimed that rioters had “blackmailed” the House into considering the bill. Anderson, however, saw the violence as a result of “conditions that for all too long have been left untended in our society.”

A final attempt to disrupt the bill by sending it to committee was rejected by a vote of 229 to 195, and the resolution passed by a vote of 250 to 172. President Johnson signed the bill into law on April 11, 1968.

BANNING DISCRIMINATION

There were two key points in the Civil Rights Act of 1968 that addressed the issue of fair housing:

• OPEN HOUSING: When the Senate returned the civil rights bill to the House, it contained a controversial administration-backed open-housing provision banning racial discrimination. The showdown vote in the House was on April 10 on a motion to order the previous question on a resolution to accept the Senate version of the bill without change. The motion was adopted by a 229-195 vote.

• HOUSING: On May 28, the senate passed a $5 billion housing and urban development bill to facilitate home ownership by low- and moderate-income families. The vote was 67-4. As cleared later by the House, it was the most far-reaching housing legislation since the Housing Act of 1949. On July 26, the House adopted the conference report on the administration-backed Housing and Urban Development Act. The conference report deleted strict House limits on the income of families receiving aid to buy or rent homes, permitting more families to qualify than the House originally favored. The vote was 228-135.

On July 23, 1961, the housing committee of the Tampa Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) made the following observation in a letter to its branch membership. The committee reasoned that “Everybody needs food, clothing and shelter.” The local committee’s simple and to-the-point statement was intended to bolster the branch’s ongoing push for Tampa Mayor Julian B. Lane, property owners and the business community to support open housing for all citizens: black, white and Hispanic.

Beginning with President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the late 1930s, it was the federal government that helped create the segregated housing patterns that plagued Tampa and other cities across America. When North Boulevard Homes, a subdivision, was built in West Tampa, the federal government restricted public housing funds to projects built specifically for black families (North Boulevard Homes in West Tampa), white families (Riverview Terrace in North Tampa) or Hispanic families (Ponce de Leon Homes in East Tampa). There could be no “race mixing” in public housing developments in America. Housing patterns close to these developments generally reflected the makeup of these large apartment complexes.

In the early 1960s, Lane worked with NAACP Florida field secretary Robert W. Saunders to bring black and white parties together, although many came to the table reluctantly. Tampa weathered its Open-Housing storm during Lane’s administration without any major civil disturbances.

In *A synopsis of the civil rights struggle in Tampa and the role of the Tampa Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Saunders, a Tampa native, wrote, “as pressures for institutional change mounted, so did the attitudes of a large number of white citizens.” No longer were Tampa’s black communities content to accept segregation in housing or in other aspects of their lives, and many white citizens began to change old attitudes.

At the same time black Americans were struggling to achieve civil rights in America, Mexican-American farmworkers started movements to secure their rights as laborers. A key leader in this movement was Cesar Chavez, who was born into a family of migrant workers in Yuma, Arizona in 1927. Throughout the agricultural regions of the U.S., Latino families worked long hours harvesting crops for inadequate wages and no protection from poor working conditions. HUMAN RIGHTS AND OPEN HOUSING

By Charles F. “Fred” Hearns

Mayor Julian B. Lane encountered numerous incidents centered around human rights and open housing during his one term in office, from 1959 to 1963:

• The 1960 sit-in demonstrations at the F. W. Woolworth department store
• The eventual desegregation of the Tampa Theatre and other businesses on Franklin Street
• The 1961 bomb threat made as the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. arrived at West Tampa’s Fort Homer Hesterly Armory to give a speech at a Freedom Fund rally to thousands of supporters
• The euphoria of the Nov. 18, 1963 visit to Tampa by President John F. Kennedy, contrasted against the shock America endured when it received the news of his assassination four days later in Dallas.

A compelling story

How Tampa went from being a typical southern town in the 1940s plagued by slums created by racism, segregation and discrimination to a municipality that today earns national recognition from HUD fair housing officials is a compelling story.

Tampa began turning the corner on attacking racial discrimination in housing as early as 1959. That year Elder Warren Banfield, pastor of the Mount Calvary Seventh Day Adventist Church, located on Scott Street, and one-time president of the Tampa branch of the NAACP, had an inspiration.

Banfield went to businessman Morris Wolf and asked if he would donate funds to help people living in poverty in the Scrub – a poverty-stricken community located just blocks from downtown Tampa.

The Wolf Brothers opened their first store in 1899, and it was a popular city treasure. It was known for decades for its high-quality clothing, hats and shoes. Franklin Street in Tampa in the 1950s was the equivalent of today’s shopping mall. A lot of black and white professionals bought their special outfits there.

Most residents were trapped in a cycle of poverty, with few skills, training and job placement opportunities available. Many children dropped out of high school before graduating, and there were frequent tensions with police officers.

Building alliances

Walter agreed to work with the pastor to help bring business and community leaders together. They began holding meetings and organized an informal biracial group.

In 1961, the small group that Banfield and Wolf formed became the foundation for Lane’s Bi-Racial Committee. It was one of the first such public-private biracial partnerships in Florida. Some of the early black members of the committee, which became a commission, were chairman the Rev. A. Leon Lowry, Perry Harvey, C. Blythe Andrews, Raynell Sloan, the Rev. W. H. Calhoun, Clarence Wilson and attorney (later Hillsborough County judge) George Edgecomb.

Early white commission members were attorney Cody Fowler, Sandy Moffett, Bob Thomas, A. R. Ragsdale, the Rev. Wilson Dodd, Byron Bushnell, Dr. Conrad Ferlita and Robert L. Cromwell.

This ethnographic report highlighted the deplorable living conditions that lead to high infant mortality, unemployment and general despair that existed within a 15-minute walk to City Hall.

The 1934 Federal Housing Administration’s impact

The Great Depression, which began in 1929, wiped out the wealth of millions of families across the United States. Black families suffered disproportionately during this era, in employment and in home ownership. Many people who owned homes sold them for what equity they could get. Millions more who were renting moved in with relatives or became homeless. By the time President Franklin Delano Roosevelt took office on March 4, 1933, the public was crying out for relief from the federal government.

In 1934, Congress approved the National Housing Act. This led to the creation of the Federal Housing Administration (FHA). The FHA was designed, in part, to guarantee mortgage payments when homeowners could not make their payments and to build public housing for those who needed it.

However, the federal government was not exempt from the Jim Crow culture, which allowed segregation to permeate its housing services.

Sunday, June 11, 1967, began as a typically warm day to close out the weekend. Grownups were leaving the Lincoln Theater on Central Avenue, where Harrison Street came to a dead end. Giggling teenagers stood in line to get their tickets to the next show and complained about their friends being late. Couples dressed in their finest outfits entered Henry Joyner's stylish Cotton Club for a meal before the live music began. The aroma of the Greek Stand's bean soup, Cozy Corner's fried chicken sandwiches and the beef stew at Rogers' Dining Room told you that you were loved in this space.

Women strutted down the street and the men did their best to get their attention. This was the same street that stars like Ella Fitzgerald, Duke Ellington, Cab Calloway, Ray Charles, Hank Ballard and the Midnighters and baseball great Jackie Robinson had walked down years earlier.

Grandmothers sat on their porches to mind their grandchildren while they played in a yard that was half dirt, half grass. A boy walked down the sidewalk with his little dog close behind. A young mother headed for the store around the corner with her two small kids tagging along at her side. It was a typical Sunday afternoon on Central Avenue, two blocks to the east of Central Park Village.

And then it happened. In a matter of seconds, life changed forever in this special place.

A tragic consequence

Martin Chambers, who lived on Joed Court with his mother, Janie Bell Chambers, and his siblings had left home earlier that day. Suddenly, the 19-year-old and a few other black youth came running as fast as they could toward Central Park Village. They came running from the direction of a burglary downtown and were headed toward the projects.

A young white police officer named James Calvert gave chase. Martin came to a barrier and, some said, he threw his hands up as if he was surrendering. Calvert fired a single shot. Maybe it was meant to be a warning shot. But Chambers, whose friends called him Darby, fell limp and soon died.

As a large crowd gathered, Florida Sentinel-Bulletin photographer the Rev. Marion Newman, whose church was nearby, took an iconic photograph of Chambers' body being lifted into a police car for transport to a hospital. That picture appeared in the local black newspaper that week.

The Tampa riots

When night fell that Sunday evening, the young people in the community took out their years of frustration with a system that seemed to despise them just for being black. They set fires to buildings on Central Avenue and in the surrounding area. They pillaged and then destroyed several businesses. They grabbed unsuspecting white people who passed through the area and pummelled them.

They fired shots at firefighters who attempted to put out the flames and at police officers who tried to calm them. A sergeant from the Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office died of a heart attack on the scene. It took the police three hours to restore a measure of calm after the initial violence. By then four buildings had been severely burned and many stores had been looted.

As a result of what happened that day, Tampa made international news: first with the civil disturbance that stretched out over three nights and

TAKING A STAND

Tampa resident Clarence Fort was among the 4,200 attendees at the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s speech in Tampa. Interviewed by a local television station in early 2011, Fort remembered King's speech. "You could see people all dressed up in their Sunday best. Well, it was just very motivating, and it gave you the sense that you really wanted to go out and do something; that you wanted to demonstrate. You didn't worry about whether you might lose your job - but you just wanted to go for the equal rights and what it meant to us as African-Americans." Fort continued, "Our eyes did not begin to come open until Dr. King came into town and he started telling us about the injustices that, as a race of people, we faced every day."

What does the word "injustice" mean? Do you think injustice is prevalent in your community? Why do people risk their lives to challenge injustice? Would you? Make a list of examples of injustice that you have seen or heard about. Then, look in the Tampa Bay Times for additional examples. Choose at least one example from personal experience and one from the Times. Focusing on the issue of injustice, write an argument paper. Use the examples to support your claims.
second with the procedures used to restore calm. Dubbed the “Tampa Method,” the procedures involved sending young black men wearing white hats out to patrol the streets.

Dr. James O. Brookins came up with the concept during a hastily called meeting of black leaders in the community. The white hats made the men easy to distinguish from others in the area and gave them a sense of having some authority. It worked.

The tragedy brought newspaper reporters from near and far. Norris “Monalisa” Morrow, Carr Brazelton, Wallace Roby, Henry “Pokey” Gyden and Eddie Mitchell emerged as leaders of the White Hats. Gov. Claude Kirk came to Central Avenue within a few days and presented certificates to some 120 White Hats members. Authorities flew Morrow to Washington, D.C. to testify about the need for more opportunities for youth in America’s inner cities.

Tampa in the national spotlight
A few days after Chambers’ death, Hillsborough County State Attorney Paul Antinori ruled that the shooting was justified. The decision angered the people of Central Park Village. But then, within a few weeks, their lives went on without much change. The fires and the looting on Central Avenue marked the beginning of the end for the street that once had been called the Harlem of the South.

With the national spotlight on Tampa during the summer of 1967, some reporters turned their attention to the residents of Central Park Village. The news people wanted to know about the housing conditions there. How far did the residents go in school and what jobs were available to them? Did they have the option to live in housing other than that located in black neighborhoods? Where did they see themselves living and working in five years? In 10 years?

Central Park Resident Council President Essie Mae Reed remembered that Chambers had only 27 cents in his pocket when he was shot. She saw that as symbolic of the poverty and hopelessness many of the area’s residents grew up with, lived with and died with. Something had to change, she said.

A new brand
The Reed Building at the Encore Project, which replaced Central Park Village, was named in Essie Mae Reed’s honor when it opened Dec. 18, 2012. When the building opened, it had been 45 years since Chambers’ death. There is a three-dimensional tribute to Chambers, showing him sitting in front of his apartment. Reed is featured in the wall art, too, surrounded by Girl Scouts and Brownies. Reed had raised money to buy their uniforms.

It had been Reed’s dream to move back into what replaced Central Park Village – a multi million-dollar development named Encore. The Reed section of the project cost more than $30 million to construct. All the buildings at Encore – as in – bring back the joy – along Ray Charles Boulevard have musical names: the Ella, for Ella Fitzgerald; the Trio; the Tempo; and Reed, which is a sliver of wood that goes on the mouthpiece of a woodwind instrument such as a clarinet or a saxophone.

Working arm of the mayor’s committee
The City of Tampa created the Commission of Community Relations in 1964 as a “working arm and sounding board of the Mayor’s Bi-Racial Committee.” The Rev. A. Leon Lowry served as the commission’s chairman for years. The commission was the grandchild of the original biracial committee.

In 1965, Tampa native James Hammond became the first employee of the City of Tampa Commission on Community Relations. His job was to focus on human rights issues, including open housing. Hammond, Robert Saunders and Tampa NAACP Branch President Robert “Bob” Gilder took the lead in addressing the mayor, the Tampa Housing Authority board of directors, the Chamber of Commerce and other seats of power about the city’s discriminatory housing practices. Soon the stakes were about to rise.

The office’s proposal for funding the City of Tampa Commission on Community Relations Young Adult Council said, “White Hats’ – youth and young adults who grow up in the slums, particularly those who have failed repeatedly both at school and in the employment market – rarely perceive any possibility for ever succeeding in doing work, which carries society’s respect and in which they themselves can take pride. The experience they have had little encouragement to feel they have any control over their lives, or a voice in the decisions made by them.”

In 1967, the office was awarded the prestigious Lane Bryant Award and $1,000 in a ceremony in New York City for its efforts in the field of human relations.

In addition to working with residents after the civil disturbance following Chambers’ death, the staff addressed a number of other issues. They began investigating housing discrimination complaints. Without a local ordinance or a strong state or federal law, Hammond’s team did these investigations by using persuasive tactics. They relied on voluntary compliance by housing providers and lending institutions.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END

OPEN HOUSING

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and other civil rights leaders pushed hard for a federal open housing law. In 1966, King focused on housing discrimination. Civil rights advocates were conducting testing programs. A test consisted of a black person visiting a housing provider and asking if a room or a home were available. Soon afterward a white tester would ask that housing provider the same questions.

If the response was the same, there was no evidence of housing discrimination. But if the response was more favorable for the white tester, that would be evidence that discrimination in housing opportunities existed. What was missing was a federal law with resources for enforcement that prohibited housing discrimination.

King had devoted virtually all his adult life to fighting against discrimination in housing – with little progress.

A New Challenge
By Fred Hearns

I began my career with the City of Tampa on Jan. 13, 1975. At that time, the city did not have a fair housing ordinance, but we occasionally conducted a variation of a testing program. In 1976, a young black male came to the Office of Community Relations at 1465 Tampa Park Plaza to lodge a complaint. He told me that he went to a two-story home in Hyde Park that had a “Room For Rent” sign out front. He knocked on the door and a petite, elderly white female appeared. “I told her I was there about the room vacancy, the young man explained, but she told me, ‘I don’t rent to coloreds (colored people)’ and quickly closed the door.”

I listened closely to his story but secretly I doubted that anyone would be so blatant with their racism while staring another human being in the face. But when I relayed the story to my supervisor, he told me to go out to the address and ask to rent the same room.

I drove up to the house, situated on a corner of a tree-lined street, and saw that the sign still was there. I walked up and knocked on the door. Within a few seconds, the elderly woman the young man had described answered the door. “Excuse me, I’d like to rent your room,” I said to her. She looked me in the eye and said in a calm voice, “I don’t rent to coloreds.” I managed to thank her and drove back to the office in total shock.

This event happened 44 years ago, but I remember it as if it was yesterday. That is the terrible power of prejudice, bigoted language and racism. It leaves a permanent scar on your soul.

Because our office then did not have a strong local ordinance that prohibited discrimination in housing – and this case presented us with direct evidence of discrimination – all I could do was write a report on what I had experienced and forward it to Housing and Urban Development (HUD). I don’t know the outcome, but I felt fairly certain that the charging party would follow up on his complaint. I did know one thing: I wanted to do this kind of work for the rest of my life.

Tampa’s first fair housing complaint

By 1967, the City of Tampa had hired Charles I. “Goosby” Jones, John W. Daniel and George A. Davis to work with James Hammond on his Commission of Community Relations staff. All four of these men brought different skill sets to the office that complemented each other. All four men understood that young people whose families were trapped in the city’s poorest housing... needed their current cycle of poverty and discrimination to change.

Hammond, a Tampa native and a graduate of Hampton Institute, was a licensed electrician and master negotiator. Daniel Jones had been a teacher and an insurance salesman before becoming administrator of the Office of Community Relations in 1970. Daniel also had been a teacher and previously was a counselor for the Hillsborough County Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court. Both Davis, also a former educator and insurance salesman, and Daniel joined the office in 1967.

Daniel recently recalled the first complaint the office ever investigated. “It was in 1967 or 1968 and it was a housing case,” he said. “It involved a young man and a housing provider on North 40th Street. This young African-American male came to our office at Lake Avenue and 34th Street and reported that while he was away, the landlord, a local businessman, allowed someone to enter his apartment and trash it. The tenant said he believed the owner only did it because the tenant was black.

“We had a hearing on the charge and the chairman of our commission, the Rev. A. Leon Lowry, presided. It was so egregious that we settled that case in the complainant’s favor without any real legal authority to do so. We did have City of Tampa stationery – and the city carries a lot of weight – with the names of our commissioners on the letterhead. And these were some impressive people, who were well-known in the community.”

In addition to investigating employment, housing and public accommodations complaints, the commission also managed the White Hats youth development program, the Intensive Tutorial Project, the Accelerated Training Program for job placement, a civil service-sponsored training program and the Equal Employment Opportunity Project.

Creation of the Community Affairs Division

In 1972, the Metropolitan Development Agency (MDA) expanded its responsibilities. It was led by John Fernandez, director and Alton White and Gary Smith, assistant directors. Bobby L. Bowden became the manager of the City of Tampa Community Affairs Division that year. The commissioners for the Office of Community Relations were disbanded. These former commissioners became an advisory group. The former commission became the Office of Community Relations (OCR).

That year, operating on a budget of $120,000, the OCR took in 23 housing discrimination complaints and resolved 11 of them. The other housing complaints were pending closure or had been referred to other governmental agencies when the annual report was completed.

The speaker of the Florida House of Representatives appointed OCR director Jones to the Florida Commission on Human Relations (FCHR), the state civil rights office. Jones helped support passage of the State of Florida Human Rights Bill. Meanwhile, the OCR focused on maintaining good police-community relations and various community services as well as processing discrimination complaints in housing and employment.

In 1974, Bowden and White began placing the city in position to build the operational capacity necessary to become a substantially equivalent local agency. That eventually led to the city landing federal contracts with both HUD and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) to investigate and resolve fair housing and employment discrimination complaints. The OCR developed a partnership with the FCHR and began dual-filing complaints with the State of Florida.

White was a role model for many young black men. When William F. Poe became Tampa’s mayor on Oct. 3, 1974, White became his executive assistant. Thus, White was the first black man to serve as executive assistant to a Tampa mayor. He brought keen insight into the community’s needs to the mayor’s office and usually found the resources to address them. He knew key government leaders in Washington, D.C., and all over the country.

White brought sharp, dedicated minds to city government – and he delivered millions of dollars in HUD funding to supplement the city’s annual budget. By April 1977, the city had a fair housing ordinance (6431-A) and code: Section 18A-4 (a) and (e).
The Changes

After five years, the Metropolitan Development Agency (MDA) was abolished and the city established the Department of Housing, Inspections & Community Services. Still, there was no practical enforcement mechanism in place to more effectively enforce fair housing violations. Staff performed intake duties, attempted voluntary compliance within the boundaries of the ordinance and referred those complaints it could not resolve to Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

Meanwhile, there was no black representation on the Tampa City Council. Nor were there any local black people elected to county, state or federal offices. No elected champion of the people was on the council to support the Division of Community Affairs in its mission to protect citizens from being the victims of housing discrimination.

Then, in 1983, Perry Harvey Jr. (who succeeded his father as president of International Longshoremen’s Association Local #1402) was elected to the City Council – nearly 100 years after Joseph Walker became the first black person to serve in that capacity (1887 to 1888).

Harvey, a former educator, was a strong voice for fair housing and for other human rights issues while he served on the council, from 1983 to 1995. He received the Human Rights Award for his service to the community from the Tampa-Hillsborough County Human Rights Council in 1993.

Acting Assistant U.S. Attorney General John Gore, June 2018

This Justice Department will not stand by when individuals use violence and intimidation to deny fair housing rights.

A new mayor and a new ordinance

The 1987 death of young Melvin Hair at the hands of the Tampa Police Department resulted in significant civil disturbances in the College Hill Homes development. This occurred a few months short of 20 years after somewhat similar circumstances led to the death of Martin Chambers in Central Park Village.

Mayor Sandy Freedman sent a delegation of 27 city leaders to Miami to study how that city handled fallout after major civil disturbances there in the early 1990s. In 1993, Freedman appointed Bernie Holder to become the city’s first black chief of police. She also elevated community affairs from a division of city government to a department. To complement the new Department of Community Affairs’ elevated status, she named Bobby Bowden to become its director.

On Sept. 10, 1992, the Tampa City Council passed Ordinance No. 2-147 and 2. The Tampa Human Rights Ordinance, Chapter 12, known as the Tampa Code, gave the administrator of the ordinance the responsibility and the authority to receive and investigate or refer housing complaints. It also provided enforcement authority to move toward resolution of housing discrimination complaints alleged to have occurred within the Tampa city limits.

Article IV under Chapter 12 protects citizens in the sale or rental of residential property or brokerage services. It also protects persons against interference, coercion or intimidation while seeking the rights protected by the ordinance. This ordinance created a Human Rights Board and gave this group of volunteer leaders appointed by the mayor the authority to initiate complaints. It gave the board subpoena powers and the authority to conduct discovery of documents and to take

ON THE BASIS OF RELIGION

On Tuesday, June 12, 2018, the Tampa Bay Times headline read, “Tampa Man Sentenced for Threatening to Burn Down a Home Being Purchased by Muslim Family.” Tampa resident David H. Howard was sentenced by a United States district court judge to serve eight months in prison, followed by two years of supervised release, and was required to pay $30,000 in restitution for a felony civil rights violation. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, Howard pleaded guilty after “he intimidated and interfered with a family who sought to purchase a home in the Davis Islands neighborhood of Tampa, Florida, by threatening to burn down the home simply because it was being purchased by a Muslim family.”

ON THE BASIS OF DISABILITY

Complainant Ms. Rice identifies herself as a person with a disability. Rice and her husband reside on Oak Tampa Road. She alleges that the handicap ramp for her building was removed despite design and construction requirements. The subject property was built in 1992 and is managed by the Respondent Association Inc. According to Rice, in July 2017, the parking lot outside of her building was repaved and the handicap spaces were moved. On Oct. 10, 2017, the complainant, who uses a walker, fell while trying to go over the curb near her assigned parking spot. Rice uses the walker on a daily basis. About Oct. 12, 2017, the aggrieved party, her husband, informed the Board Consultant that his wife had fallen a few days prior due to the lack of ramps near their building. The Board Consultant replied that ramps were not required. As a result, Rice alleges that Respondent collectively has discriminated against her based on her disability, in violation of the Fair Housing Act and the Tampa Code, for denying her a reasonable accommodation.

After investigation by the Tampa Office of Human Rights, Respondent signed an agreement with the City and Rice. The agreement required that curb cuts/ramps would be installed throughout the condominium property; Rice and her husband would receive $10,000 for medical bills and damaged equipment; and all employees and association board officers were to take three hours of fair housing training. ON THE BASIS OF RACE OR FAMILIAL STATUS

Ms. Lofton is a black woman with three children under the age of 18. Lofton, who resides at Apartment Homes, Tampa Court Road in Tampa, alleged that she was denied rental opportunity and served with an eviction notice after living at this property for more than 10 years. According to Lofton, Respondent Management Inc. claimed that she caused a disturbance in the parking lot of the dwelling that threatened the safety and peace of other residents within the property. Lofton denies that she was a part of the disturbance that took place in the parking lot, because she was arriving home from work after the altercation had taken place.

Lofton believes that black mothers living in this building have been targeted for eviction because notices also were served on three black mothers who were not home at the time of the incident. According to the complainant’s lease agreement, she was entitled to a grievance hearing, which she was denied. Plus she alleges her time card information was not accepted by management as proof that she was coming from work on the day of the altercation. Lofton was served an eviction notice on Dec. 2, 2016. As a result, Lofton alleges that Respondents collectively have discriminated against her based on her race and family status, in violation of the Fair Housing Act and the Tampa Code, for denying her a reasonable accommodation.

After investigation by the Tampa Office of Human Rights, Respondent signed an agreement with the City and Lofton. The agreement specified that Lofton would not be evicted and the notice of eviction be removed from her tenant file, and grievance-hearing procedures be distributed to all tenants. In addition, all apartment employees were to take three hours of fair housing training. Source: City of Tampa Human Rights Office

CHANGING TIMES

The United States has gone through many changes in the past 50 years, as has the City of Tampa. After reading the articles in this publication about Tampa’s history of housing, look through the Tampa Bay Times to find articles about Tampa’s current history. Is there still bias in society? Are different sexes, races and other groups treated equally? Are there examples of racism, sexism or other forms of prejudice mentioned in the newspaper? As you look through the Times, pay attention to other aspects of the newspaper besides just the news articles. What do the advertisements, cartoons, editorials and classified sections of the newspaper tell you about society? Write a profile story about society today based on what you see in the Times throughout the week. Use specific evidence and examples to support your ideas. Share your story with your class.

Central Avenue has a special place in Tampa’s history, particularly for the black community. The Encore District – and Perry Harvey Sr. Park – is a renewed place where generations can come together to share in that history.

Considered the crown jewel of the redevelopment project, the Encore District will be the most complex mixed-income, mixed-used multi family housing deal that the Tampa Housing Authority (THA) has ever been involved with. It is anticipated the redevelopment will greatly contribute to the quality of life for its residents and the community as a whole.

A joint venture agreement between the Housing Authority of the City of Tampa and the Bank of America Community Development Corp. has been established for this development. Through this partnership, a master plan for a mixed-used, mixed-income housing development consisting of the entire Central Park site is nearing completion.

When completed, the development will consist of 2,030 residential units, 50,000 square feet of commercial retail space and 59,000 square feet of office space, including a hotel, supermarket, St. James Church restoration, Perry Harvey restoration and Town Center. Construction of this project began in the fall of 2010. Four of the 11 residential spaces will consist of THA owned affordable Housing market rate rental mixed-income rental units. Ten percent of these affordable units will be public housing. The THA and its partners expect to receive a profit of approximately a half billion dollars from the sale of individual parcels of land that have been created from this plan to private developers. This profit and the revenues generated from the operation of the affordable rate rental properties will help THA achieve its goals of quality housing for its residents and thereby lessen economic dependence on HUD subsidies.

In December 2012, the THA received word that it had been chosen to receive a $30 million Choice Neighborhood Grant for community improvements within the Central Park and Ybor City neighborhoods.

Harmony, renewal, vibration

The Encore District represents urban renewal in harmony with a vibrant past. This 40-acre master-planned, mixed-use redevelopment community just north of downtown Tampa’s urban core sits where Tampa’s historic Central Avenue once boomed with innovative businesses and thrived as a music district where jazz legends penned songs and performed often.

Spanning 12 city blocks, this energetic new downtown neighborhood will be home to professionals, families and active seniors – a multigenerational mix – and a catalyst for continuing redevelopment between Tampa’s Central Business District and Ybor City, Tampa Heights and other neighborhoods.

Once complete, Encore will have four residential buildings, which will reflect the musical heritage of the area: The Ella, the Reed, the Trio and the Tempo. Once complete, this $425-million development will be home to 2,500 people and create 1,000 permanent jobs.

Named in honor of the rich musical history of downtown Tampa’s Central Avenue in its heyday, Encore will create a symphony of new home choices for generations of people.

Celebrating the Scrub

On July 21, 2015, the City of Tampa broke ground for Perry Harvey Sr. Park. Yoselis Ramos of USF Public Media wrote: “The park celebrates the history of Central Avenue – the hub of black-owned businesses that flourished during segregation along that street, the black entertainers who passed through, and the local civil rights activists who left their footprints in Tampa.”

The improvements for Perry Harvey Sr. Park celebrate the history of Central Avenue, its community leaders and its cultural influences. The strength of the Tampa community is built on its history. Central Avenue was the heart and soul of a community flourishing with leadership, entrepreneurship, strength and courage. The area was settled after the Civil War, when freed slaves relocated to an area northeast of downtown Tampa called the Scrub.

Over time, the area grew to become a successful black residential and commercial district. The cultural attractions became legendary, bringing nationally known musical artists to Tampa, including Ray Charles, Cab Calloway, Ella Fitzgerald, James Brown and Hank Ballard. In fact, it is said that the twist was invented at an entertainment establishment along Central Avenue, inspiring the song written by Ballard, which was later made more famous by Chubby Checker. Celebrating a legacy, the Central Avenue community established itself just north of downtown Tampa and has played an important part in the history of the city. Over the years, the neighborhood of the Scrub developed a vibrant business district, and became a cultural mecca of sorts for a number of black musicians.

The area was booming, but began to decline with urban renewal and integration. In 1967, the shooting of 19-year-old Martin Chambers resulted in three days of rioting, which contributed to the downturn of the area.

In 1974, the last of the buildings along Central Avenue, Henry Joyner’s Cotton Club, was closed and demolished. Five years later, in 1979, Perry Harvey Sr. Park was developed at the request of local youth looking for a place of their own to recreate near their homes. The park was named after Perry Harvey Sr., who was the founder and long time president of the International Longshoremen’s Association Local 1402 and a local civil rights leader.

Harvey had a large impact on the lives of Tampa’s black community. Among his many accomplishments, he brought better wages, benefits and improved working conditions to Tampa’s predominantly black dock workers. He helped create a black middle class in Tampa, helped create the first black-owned apartment building and plaza, and sought educational opportunities for all children in the community.

GOING BEYOND THE TEXT

Watch the award-winning PBS film Central Avenue Remembered, which takes an intriguing look at the historic Central Avenue neighborhood in Tampa, Florida, which is now becoming Encore: video.wedu.org/video/wedu-documentaries-central-avenue-remembered. Greetings,

It is a pleasure to welcome you to this 50+ Years of Fair Housing: Past, Present & Future in the City of Tampa publication that is included in the Tampa Bay Times Newspaper in Education edition. It celebrates the passage of the Fair Housing Act along with its history in the City of Tampa and the Office of Human Rights. The passage of Title VIII of the 1968 Civil Rights Act, enacted by the 90th United States Congress, was landmark legislation that guarantees fair housing and equal opportunity.

An essential element to a thriving city is its diversity and capacity to work, live and play as one community. For more than forty years, fair and equal housing has been an important goal of the City of Tampa and it established the Office of Human Rights to enforce our local, state and federal anti-discrimination laws, ensuring each person’s right to housing within their means without regard to their status. In Tampa, we guarantee housing opportunities for all Tampanians by prohibiting discrimination concerning the sale, rental and financing of housing based on race, religion, national origin, disability, and sex. Our mission includes empowering individuals to live free from discrimination, and in communities open and welcoming to everyone no matter who they love, their gender, or the size of their family.

As you read this publication, you will discover that the City of Tampa is proud of its efforts to further fair housing and recognizes that this can only be accomplished through forging partnerships with other governmental agencies, corporations, for profit and non-profit organizations, entrepreneurs, and all persons interested in fair housing.

Sincerely,

Bob Buckhorn

City of Tampa Office of Human Rights

The City of Tampa Office of Human Rights provides impartial, unbiased investigation services of discrimination complaints in the areas of employment, housing and public accommodations by any person who believes he or she has been treated unfairly on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, age, disability, familial status or marital status.

Mediation services also are offered to both parties as a voluntary, informal and confidential way for all involved to reach an early resolution of the case. These services are free of charge.

The office coordinates outreach activities by offering employment, housing and public accommodations workshops and seminars to keep the public informed about their legal rights. The office staff also provides guidance to those involved in the industry of housing, employment and public places serving customers within the city of Tampa.

The office serves as liaison to the Tampa Human Rights Board, an advisory board that plays an essential role in city government. The board consists of a diverse group of mayoral and City Council appointees.

Questions regarding discrimination complaints or the investigation process should be made directly to the Office of Human Rights, 813-274-5835. For more information, go to tampagov.net/human-rights.

Newspaper in Education

The Tampa Bay Times Newspaper in Education program (NIE) is a cooperative effort between schools and the Times Publishing Co. to encourage the use of newspapers in print and electronic form as educational resources – a living textbook. Our educational resources fall into the category of informational text, a type of nonfiction text. The primary purpose of informational text is to convey information about the natural or social world.

NIE serves educators, students and families by providing schools with class sets of the Pulitzer Prize-winning Tampa Bay Times plus award-winning original educational publications, teacher guides, lesson plans, educator workshops and many more resources — all at no cost to schools, teachers or families. In 2017-2018, NIE provided more than 1.5 million print copies and 10 million digital editions of the Times to area classrooms free of charge thanks to our generous subscribers and individual, corporate and foundation sponsors.

NIE teaching materials cover a variety of subjects and are aligned to the Florida Standards. For more information about NIE, visit tampabay.com/nie, call 727-893-8138 or email ordernie@tampabay.com. Follow us on Twitter at twitter.com/tbtimesnie. Like us on Facebook at facebook.com/tbtbie.
